Winter

by Ronda Angel

Icicles hang off the fence, like the edge of a lace tablecloth. The snow, a hand-knit blanket, covers the ground. Snowflakes have free reign in the air as they twirl and swirl and loop over cars, mailboxes, woolen hats, clapping mittens. The wind, crisp and sharp, comes and goes like an uncertain guest, hoping to be invited in. Gray sky, a bulky sweater of moisture, turns darker as night creeps over the fairy-white branches.
